This book is not representative of the best of the Seattle restaurant scene; it woefully ignores most ethnic food. Seattle has some excellent Japanese, Chinese, Ethiopian, Balkan, etc. restaurants and chef who deserve a bit more notice. After gritting my teeth at the selection bias, the restaurants selected are among the top Seattle restaurants - some based on longevity of producing great food, others based on contemporary innovation. There are entries such as Il Fornaio's "Penne Vodka" that have few ties to their geographic setting of Seattle. I much prefer the Herb Farm's "Douglas Fir Sorbet" which ties both to the forests around Seattle and to the Scandinavians who settled here. Several recipes take advantage of the local Dungeness crab: "Dungeness Crab and Artichoke Dip", "Ray's Dungeness Crab and Corn Chowder", "Spicy Grill Dungeness Crab", "Dungeness Crab Macaroni and Cheese", "Dungeness Crab Cakes" ... In this way, the book fulfills the need of a tourist wishing to recreate the flavors of the Pacific Northwest. (But no, there is no geoduck.) But it also fails to present what a native Seattlelite would crave should they move away - Copper River salmon sashimi, blue huckleberry cobbler, . . .

I originally purchased this as a gift for a birthday present and liked it so much I kept it for myself. I gave them something else and wanted to try all these recipes for my own family since we had recently gone to Seattle. Luckily I had purchased some other items for the recipient while in Seattle, but just wanted an additional item to include.

A great selection of restaurants and recipes...though some of the restaurants are no longer around
:/ So it goes...

I bought this for a friend and almost didn't want to give it away after looking through it. I love that it gives recipes right from area restaurants. None of them look too complicated and all look delicious. Has great photos too.

Great book. I bought it again for a gift to another friend.

Perfect gift coming from Seattle - features great recipes from local restaurants.
