Synopsis

“So | what’s the lecture going to be?” I say as I look around the Science room. There are long tables lined up and a desk in front. All of the tables are covered with machinery. “Going to tell me that I can’t skip school in the middle of the day?” “You skipped school for an entire year, I figure it’s too late to go into that,” Nico says, dropping down in the chair at the desk. “I just figured you’d want to talk about it.” “About what?” I ask. “Going to meet your mother,” he says. I go still, feeling completely off-guard by that. “What?” “You found out about her, so you should want to see her, right? I know I would. I did, in a way.” “I don’t know what you’re talking about,” I say, starting for the door. “I barely saw my father while I was growing up. He was always away, out saving the world. I was around your age at the time when I decided to do it. I’d just thrown my stepmother out of the house.” “You did what?” I say, my jaw dropping. “She was trying to make Liz tougher than I am. Liz hadn’t even come into her powers at the time,” he says. “It was pretty much child abuse. I threw her out of the house, told her not to come back. She never did. It left me with a little girl to raise and an old man that was never there.” “So you went to find him,” I say, absently sitting down in one of the larger chairs in the room. “Yeah,” he says. “I couldn’t even fly at the time, so I ran all the way to Saint Louis, just to see him at one of his appearances. He didn’t even notice me in the crowd.” “Did you have an illusion watch on?” “I wore a hat.” “How big was the crowd?” I ask. It startles a laugh out of him. “It was massive,” he admits. “But I was a kid.” “I was HIS kid. I expected him to be able to pick me out of a crowd. I went home, feeling completely abandoned. It felt like his job was more important than his family ever would be. I wasn’t wrong, either. Even though Sparky was gone, we still barely saw him. He would come home only when he needed to sleep. Just like I am, now, he only had to sleep once every three or four days. He would head straight for his bed and sleep so deep that I felt like I was stuck guarding him, as well as Liz.” “So | with that sob story, you really expect me to go out and find her?” I say.

Customer Reviews

I rate the entire series at four-and-a-half stars and having bought all 18 of the main story line so far, and read them all one after another, I found them all really good and they make for a fun, relaxing read. They are aimed at a younger audience but even so I really enjoyed all 18 and loved the heroes, and the villains, and their journey to cape-hood.

Love the action, the humor and the camaraderie in this book. The idea of The Grim Reaper being a villan and a buisness-man is also pretty cool, and the fact that he might live in the apartments leaves a lot of possibilities for the future. The implications of Cosmic and other planets also leave a lot of possibilities for future adventures.

Love this series! Appropriate for the whole family and a fun concept for a super world. Great characters and some hysterical scenes make this a fun ride.

Being fifteen is tough. Having a family legacy is tough. Having two legacies, an adoptive family with a third legacy, and looking like a living statue may be one of the harder teen girl lives in fiction. Watch Sandra struggle with that combination, and a toxic terrorist, in this latest Cape High book.

Liked this book just like all the others it gives a fascinating look into the super world. Can't wait for the next one.

I've read the series. Stories are light and entertaining and fun to read. It's not Asimov but writing is fairly decent for this age of self-published... material. Recommended for superhero genre fans.

I was so excited for Sandra's book. Well written and entertaining as always. A little shorter than the more recent books (at least it felt that way) but still wonderful.

I have the entire series. Each time a new book comes out, I have re-read them. Excellent for three young readers. And very entertaining for the "I want to be young again" groups.
