Dhaka To Dakar: Across Africa - Chapter 18: Burkina Faso

Synopsis

Burkina Faso is a little country in central West Africa, and a place where things would go seriously awry for me. This is where I got malaria, the disease that claims so many lives each year. It's also a very hot and dry place, but an interesting little country to visit. I managed to get to Ouagadougou, Banfora and Bobo-Dioulasso whilst there, and also see what it's like to spend time in two African hospitals. Travelling and backpacking is not always easy, but it's usually never as hard as this! Read this chapter to find out about Burkina Faso, to hear about some interesting and different people I met, and to find out how and how well I survived one of the biggest killers on Earth - malaria. Text is supplemented with many photographs taken by the author!

Customer Reviews

I really enjoyed this book, especially given its modest cost and production efforts. The photos are great and were easy to view in my Kindle Paperwhite. The author has an engaging writing style. I was trying to do some research on Burkina Faso as a country for human rights reporting purposes. This book gave me a very good anecdotal coverage of the people and countryside. I was especially intrigued to hear of the author's ability to use Internet cafes everywhere he went, which helped me establish in my human rights reporting that Internet access is possible in the country, even if it is one of the poorest and most technology-challenged countries in the world.
